A MOUNTAIN ROSE

HE following history of Rose Manilla, we gleaned from the driver and from others who had known the village beauty from her infancy.

Five years before she had been the most lovely girl of Dosoliro and the surrounding countryside, and the young men of Gravelous spoke with enthusiasm of her matchless beauty. They named her "The Mountain Rose," and even the dreaded custom house officers fell, one and all, a prey to the charms of the peerless daughter of Manilla the smuggler. But the latter guarded her with the most savage ferocity, giving her this brief counsel: "Amuse yourself as much as you please with these young fools; but beware of seriously encouraging any one of them, more especially one of my own calling; for should you ever become the fiancée of a smuggler the lives of both of you shall pay the forfeit."

All knew from the determined and desperate character of the man that he would keep his word.

As yet Rosa had felt no temptation to disobey the imperious mandate of her father, for the young men of the neighborhood had each and all failed to awaken the slumbering passions of the dark-eyed beauty.

"I care for none of them," she said with a proud indifference, not unmingled with contempt. "But if ever I meet with one whom I can truly love the case will be different. I shall take my destiny in my own hands."

About this time Constantino Valsassina, a daring smuggler, and famous hunter of the mountains, whose name was well known as a desperado in all the country round, appeared on the scene. He was strong, courageous and handsome. The hitherto cold and impassive heart of the village beauty was stirred to its depths, and she determined that, come what might she would wed no other than this one hero, this Napoleon of the forests.

What did the bold and young smuggler care for the threats of Manilla? He resolved that he would win the splendid Rose of the Mountains, and he kept his word.

She was just 20 years of age, and, perhaps, had tired of the lonely life she had hitherto been compelled to lead, or it may be that her affections, like some marvelous mountain plants, were late in flowering; for never before had Rosa Manilla's heart been stirred by that mysterious passion which men call love. The first time she met the hunter she only blushed deeply, and then turned pale. He noted the sigh, and then ventured one evening at sunset, on returning from the forest, to place a bouquet of mountain flowers on her balcony. Instead of receiving them with indifference or merriment, as was her wont, she raised the sweet-smelling blossoms to her lips and kissed them with a sigh.

From that moment Valsassina felt he had conquered, and the lovers lost no opportunity of being together. Soon the neighbors began to gossip, and those who had at first pitied the girl, condemned to live a solitary and loveless life, with strange inconsistency now blamed her severely for her disobedience to her father. Her companions, the village maidens, began to experience the pangs of jealousy, for the handsome smuggler had won other hearts besides that of the Mountain Rose, while the men felt wounded because each imagined that in past days she had shown some preference for himself, and hated his victorious rival accordingly. While they had all felt that she could be the bride of none of them, they had been resigned to their fate; but the sight of the newcomer, the adventurer, winning the prize over their heads, was too much for them.
